ALBERTINE

DOOR

F.J. ANDRIESSON
unintelligible. It is a burden that cannot be borne. The burden is real, and it weighs heavily on the shoulders of the hearers. They struggle to understand the words, but they are lost. They are in a state of confusion. They do not know what to do. They feel helpless and overwhelmed. They are afraid. They are in a state of despair. They do not know what to do. They feel lost. They are in a state of confusion. They do not know what to do. They feel helpless and overwhelmed. They are afraid. They are in a state of despair. They do not know what to do. They feel lost. They are in a state of confusion. They do not know what to do. They feel helpless and overwhelmed. They are afraid. They are in a state of despair. They do not know what to do. They feel lost. They are in a state of confusion. They do not know what to do. They feel helpless and overwhelmed. They are afraid. They are in a state of despair. They do not know what to do. They feel lost. They are in a state of confusion. They do not know what to do. They feel helpless and overwhelmed. They are afraid. They are in a state of despair. They do not know what to do. They feel lost. They are in a state of confusion. They do not know what to do. They feel helpless and overwhelmed. They are afraid. They are in a state of despair. They do not know what to do. They feel lost. They are in a state of confusion. They do not know what to do. They feel helpless and overwhelmed. They are afraid. They are in a state of despair. They do not know what to do. They feel lost. They are in a state of confusion. They do not know what to do. They feel helpless and overwhelmed. They are afraid. They are in a state of despair. They do not know what to do. They feel lost. They are in a state of confusion. They do not know what to do. They feel helpless and overwhelmed. They are afraid. They are in a state of despair. They do not know what to do. They feel lost. They are in a state of confusion. They do not know what to do. They feel helpless and overwhelmed. They are afraid. They are in a state of despair. They do not know what to do. They feel lost. They are in a state of confusion. They do not know what to do. They feel helpless and overwhelmed. They are afraid. They are in a state of despair. They do not know what to do. They feel lost. They are in a state of confusion. They do not know what to do. They feel helpless and overwhelmed. They are afraid. They are in a state of despair. They do not know what to do. They feel lost. They are in a state of confusion. They do not know what to do. They feel helpless and overwhelmed. They are afraid. They are in a state of despair. They do not know what to do. They feel lost. They are in a state of confusion. They do not know what to do. They feel helpless and overwhelmed. They are afraid. They are in a state of despair. They do not know what to do. They feel lost. They are in a state of confusion. They do not know what to do. They feel helpless and overwhelmed. They are afraid. They are in a state of despair. They do not know what to do. They feel lost. They are in a state of confusion. They do not know what to do. They feel helpless and overwhelmed. They are afraid. They are in a state of despair. They do not know what to do. They feel lost. They are in a state of confusion. They do not know what to do. They feel helpless and overwhelmed. They are afraid. They are in a state of despair. They do not know what to do. They feel lost. They are in a state of confusion. They do not know what to do. They feel helpless and overwe
...and there it went. A song for a man, for an old lady, for a dear friend. It was a song for every heart. The music was simple, yet it spoke volumes. It was the voice of the people, the voice of hope, the voice of humanity. The words were few, yet they were profound. The melody was pure, yet it touched the soul. It was a song to remember, a song to cherish, a song to share with all. It was a song that would live on, a song that would be passed down through the generations. It was a song that would never be forgotten, a song that would always be remembered. It was a song that would inspire, a song that would motivate, a song that would bring joy.