Een Gevaarlijke Rit

A. H. Boels Jr.

Dennison & Co.
After all, my dear dave, I cannot imagine that you would attempt to falsely accuse me or anyone else of failing to keep my promise. As I have already stated, I am not responsible for the events that transpired. It was simply a misunderstanding.

As for the reason behind my silence, it was because I felt it was not necessary to reveal my intentions at the time of the attack. I had hoped that things would be resolved peacefully, but unfortunately, that was not the case.

I understand that my actions may have caused concern among some, but I assure you that my motives were pure. I was simply trying to protect my family and the innocent people of the town.

Please know that I have no ill intentions towards anyone and that my goal is to bring peace to this area. I would be more than happy to discuss any further matters with you, as long as it is done in a respectful and reasonable manner.
p. 28

Dr. Robert Brown's garden was a small one, yet it contained a vast number of varieties of plants. He was a keen gardener and took great care in selecting the best specimens. Every year, he would add new plants to his collection, always keeping an eye out for rare and unusual species. His garden was not just a place for growing plants, but also a laboratory for experimenting with different cultivation techniques. Dr. Brown would often share his knowledge with other gardeners, and his garden became a hub for exchange of ideas and techniques.

p. 29

Yesterday, I visited the local library and found a fascinating book on the history of gardening. It traced the development of gardens from ancient times to modern-day practices. It was fascinating to see how different cultures and societies have contributed to the art of gardening. The book also highlighted the importance of garden design in relation to the environment and the community. It's a shame that we often take gardens for granted and don't appreciate the work that goes into creating and maintaining them.
that office, but strictly private matters. Thus...

and the people in the neighboring offices. They...